Apart from all of this being public bullshit

You saying you don't support illegal activities doesn't make it less illegal to sell guides for blackhat activities...

If your monetizing techniques would make any relevant amounts you wouldn't be selling them for $7 ;)

Edit: Just saw you sell an ebook on Java but are looking to hire a Java developer for a school project? That doesn't add up.

You can search online how to make a wooden table, still you go to Ikea and buy a good one. It's the same thing. I want something done by a professional, I don't have time to learn Java.

2 questions then:

- Why do you offer a professional $40 for 'a couple hours of work'
- Why do you think you're in the position to sell an eBook about learning Java if you're not good at Java?

Concepts are extremely similar across programming languages so I'll assume that you don't know any language (which isn't an issue)

Please don't try to sell people resources to get started on programming if you have no experience on programming yourself. Try pointing them at decent free resources instead :)

1. How much would you pay a professional hourly? I'd pay roughly 13/15$. Also I will be giving out all the resources that are necessary to make the project, so there is no need to search for anything on Google.

2. Libraries do not sell book they have made. They sell books other people have made. Out of all the stuff there is in the package I made just a few. I am mostly good with social engineering, and that's the stuff I have done

"I'll hard pass this one" I don't think the reason why I got banned onto anything is your business. And even if it was, I am not asking no one's opinion.

Libraries don't sell books.

The average developer in the US makes about $33 an hour although this might be higher for you since you're hiring a freelancer.
