Thread: I can't believe people are taking a horse de-wormer to treat COVID

HerdyGerdyMan - August 28, 2021, 4:04 pm

I can't believe that people are taking Ivermectin, a veterinarian medication meant for de-worming horses, as a treatment for COVID.

I'd imagine that the result of taking medicine intended only for use in animals, would make a human being extremely ill, or worse!

If there is anyone here reading this post who is a doctor, pharmacist, veterinarian, or someone with related expertise, I'd like to hear your professional opinion on this.

Well some people are fucking idiots, period.

It's not about which animal should take X, in the end, it's still a drug, not to mention- I'm sure this is not the first time this has happened, and if it has true potential to really cure COVID, why are you so against it? people are literally doing everything they can to solve this "crisis".

I'd say the problem nowadays is people are so stuck on textbook writing rather than practicality, that it literally blinds you from any potential solution, and haven't you seen some people take it already? they're completely fine.

I'm no professional, but I'm pretty sure there's a reason some medications are meant for animals and not human consumption.

I believe the real problem is algorithms, misinformation and idiots who believe anything that fits their worldview.

Some people also use Fentanyl perfectly fine, that doesn't mean you'll have the same outcome.

Lmao I was thinking the same thing but I've been tempted to try ketamine so ima keep my mouth shut ?

Like one person said above, in INCREDIBLY SMALL doses meant for humans, Ivermectin can potentially cure COVID but as far as I know it is incredibly expensive or something. It's quite a mystery and I'm confounded by that. If there's a possibility it could help people and end this thing, then why isn't it being explored further? Why hasn't cancer been cured yet? Shrugs
