Systemic racism is real

Common core math makes more sense

Religion is a philosophy, not factual

Night is a good leader

>> Systemic racism isn't real. Just because someone is in power - it doesn't make their stupid beliefs that of governance. Sure in the past there definitely were a lot of instances of system racism in the US because it's shit - but claiming it's there now is stupid. Individual organizations might still have racial bias through hiring practices which is illegal but sure it 'can' and I'm sure 'does' happen and goes unchallenged but that is still illegal.

Common core math is retarded. Stick to problem-solving. Half of the worlds issues could be fixed by having more people understand how to go about solving an issue in general not just math.

It depends on what you think is 'factual' - googling "define factual" we see two definitions.

{concerned with what is actually the case.}

{actually occurring.}

While I am agnostic myself, disproving that religion isn't 'actually occurring' isn't that cut and dry. If someone has a psychological breakdown or hears voices, I can't prove they don't hear them. To them, that is factual.

Night - no clue who that is but he's probably a bad leader if he's wasting time convincing you he's a good one.

$20 bucks says the same feeling that makes your grandma/mom/etc walk across the street when she sees some black or brown people approaching is the feeling of systemic racism. Not systematic, systemic. It's a feeling of uncertainty or a feeling of doubt about someone based on there differences in appearance.

Quote:Common core math is retarded. Stick to problem-solving. Half of the worlds issues could be fixed by having more people understand how to go about solving an issue in general not just math.

Bro, common core math is literally the way of the future. It teaches people how math actually works instead of just requiring the pupil to remember things. Imagine, instead of simply "memorizing" your times tables or counting on your fingers to get to the answer you could actually "show your work". Any kid who did not learn common core math cannot show their work for $7 \times 6 = x$ because we only know the shortcut, but we don't know how we got there.

If you are schizophrenic and hear voices, they are still fictional. Sorta like how a man these days can claim to be a woman and it's real to them. I've got some bad news for both parties. The dude is not a chick, and the voices are not real. There is a difference between reality and perceived reality

The problem is much deeper than giving a job to someone of color just to appease democrats...

Your reasons for wanting those laws are based off selfish desires. You want to control other people do that you feel secure in your own head.

Reading comprehension... I didn't say you were left. I said the systemic racism has been ingrained by the left. Meaning, they institutionalized it long before the right did.

Nah. See, details. I agree the Imperial system is... not an ideal system. I'd love if we switched to metric. It makes more sense, logically. Common core is not logical, its convoluted and messy. I've yet to see how common core is easier, especially when applying to real-world situations.

Firstly, common core math explains how math works and does not rely on memorization. Stop characterizing shit you see on facebook (oh look how hard my kids math homework is!) to things in the real world like finding the distance between two points. If you want to argue that common core doesn't make sense for something like 400-120 I would just tell you that the way you learned it (the short way) is more effective if you already know the short way, common core makes it a bit harder to understand for YOU because you already know how to subtract, but do you know what you're doing when you subtract? You think you do, but if you don't like common core you probably don't actually get how subtraction works.

In more complex problems, like lets say some calculus....you want to build a zip-code store finder in php and you want to put in a zip code and find the closest store. Common core math would be very helpful in helping you understand how to form an equation to solve this issue for you.

As for the metric system...i'm glad we agree. But if you like how the metric system makes math easy, i'm not sure I understand why you don't see the same thing about common core unless you are just regurgitating what you saw on social media here. You probably saw some kids math homework on a post and you were just echo everyone elses thoughts that it's confusing. Have you personally spent time trying to learn common core methodologies? Have you watched even a single video that explains it? I bet I could send you a few videos that would change your mind about common core principals.

That switch never occurred. There have been shifts, but I know plenty of old racist Southern Democrats that are still Democrats, though they're not as "progressive" as a typical leftist. They support certain government programs because, without them, "colored folk can't help themselves."

Decent read:

<https://newstalk1130.iheart.com/featured/common-sense-central/content/2018-05-01-the-myth-of-the-republican-democrat-switch/>

Quote: Yet this shift was a gradual, decades-long transition and not a sudden "shift" in response to the Civil Rights movement of the 1960s. Racism didn't turn the South Republican--if it did, then why did it take 30 years for those racist voters to finally give the GOP a majority of southern House seats? Why did it take racist voters in Georgia 38 years to finally vote for a Republican governor? And why did only one southern Democrat ever switch to the Republican Party?

The myth of the great Republican-Democrat "switch" summarily falters under the weight of actual historical analysis, and it becomes clear that prolonged electoral shifts combined with the phenomenal nationwide popularity of Republicans Richard Nixon in 1972 and Ronald Reagan in 1980 and 1984 were the real reason for the Republican strength in the south.

Reagan in particular introduced the entire nation to conservative policies that it found that it loved, sparking a new generation of Republican voters and politicians who still have tremendous influence today.

Racism had nothing to do with it. That is simply a Democratic myth.

That doesn't make any sense. ? I have kids, they understand how and why math works. My 4 year old can do basic math in her head. I pose real-world problems and without me even asking she gives answers. Because she understands how and why it works. Trying to teach someone new to math the common core way is excessive and just sounds like a way to justify needing more teachers.

A kid like me would have gotten bored with it, checked-out, and been left behind. I admit that Common Core can help SOME kids that don't learn well the traditional way, but by completely abandoning the traditional way, they're now putting kids further behind than they would have. I think they should teach traditionally, but with common core as something to expand upon for those that can't learn very well traditionally.

You left this pretty open ended so I will respond open ended.

Precious Metal & Jewlery (not diamonds). Investing in precious metal and insuraing it is a great investment. You keep the jewlery and insure it, and then you use the insurance policy as collateral. This way you keep the jewlery but get its value in collateral.

Life Insurance - Same reason as above, the bigger the policy the more collateral

Litecoin - It is the only widely crypto that makes sense as an every-day spending currency

Rolls Royce Stock ($RYCEY) - Severely undervalued, and the company has a patent for a small nuclear engine

Square Inc ($SQ) - They are a massive player in the payments industry and simultaneously making moves in the music publishing, nft, crypto, and buy now pay later fields.

Land in the United States - Owning land is usually a good investment.

The question was indeed intentionally left open as to gain as much insight into your opinion as possible.

Thank you for your detailed response. Ivesting in a company that makes fake diamonds, might not be a bad idea, to counteract your advice not to invest in companies that handle diamonds. Food for thought! Although the end game for both branches would turn into diamonds becoming absolutely worthless. Short-term, though.

My only diss on diamonds is that they aren't insurable. They are, but not for anything close to MSRP.

Let me give you an example:

My wifes ring was $5300 due mostly to diamonds which is insured for about $3000
My Breitling watch with rose gold bracelet was about $3,500 and is insured for $4,500

The watch with the gold band is valued higher than what I paid, because even if no one buys watches (Ha!, fat chance) the gold in the band is still worth more than the diamonds in my wifes ring.

So then, you are out $8.3k in cash, but you now have $7k in collateral to use for loans/credit/down payment/etc

However, as you can see, I take a loss on the diamond ring's value because diamonds aren't actually worth shit.

On the flip side, companies that make fake diamonds are pretty cool, they can make some seriously beautiful looking diamonds in labs these days for 1/10th the cost

Your organs than stop, and you have no pulse.

Once this happens, your body either decays or is cremated.
