Thread: Do you worry about random acts of violence?

Livewire - October 9, 2022, 8:01 pm

I wouldn't say it's something I really fret over, but It's something I know can happen cause people are crazy af.

It's just in the back of my mind sometimes that people are capable of some horrible shit for little to no reason.

Gary - October 9, 2022, 8:03 pm

I'm not so worried, however where I live there's been an increased number of random assaults. The subject charged mainly being homeless. Police can only do so much however the court system is failing society as whole.

Stay strapped or get clapped.

I ain't dying with a negative K/D ratio.

I have to get a new pistol. I had one for a while, but got rid of it.

I felt soo much better having it on me/in my car.

Teamkills result in deaths.

However, revivals are not counted towards the kill/death ratio.

Jesus, how many people did you assist in killing?

If you're playing zombies, you'll have a kills / downs / revives

Downs being how many times you've gone down yourself

Revives being how many times you've revived others.

If somebody shoots someone else and I start CPR but can't save them do I get an assist?

Technically I'm the last person to touch them.

MP's are just pricks, imagine giving some a ticket for going 3 MPH over.
In the military you have to report to your next in command that you got a ticket.
Usually involves you getting fucked over for a fine and with extra shit from your COC.

But some of those rules are dumb.
Couldn't have 240's or tons of ammo in any vehicle with medic flaps.
Couldn't shoot a 50 CAL as a medic unless it was in defense of your patients.
Wasn't supposed to have grenades.
Bunch of dumb shit.

The point was you should be more considerate about things which put you or your relatives in danger. If everybody didn't care about violence nothing would get done about it. I personally wouldn't take my son around certain parts of the UK. Almost all the knife attacks you see in the UK are committed by marijuana users.

I think when it comes to Marijuana knife attacks its normally drug dealer on drug dealer crime, or on the odd occasion the marijuana user was already messed in the head and the solicitor has used the marijuana to get a lesser sentence, i remember seeing a website on HackForums and marijuana crimes but i cant find it

The dealers are often smokers also. Even if they're messed up beforehand, it's after they use marijuana that they go on to commit violence. But there's mounting evidence even the healthy become mentally ill after smoking this potent, dangerous botanical poison. There's a link to them in my signature. Marijuana is illegal by up to 5 years in prison in the UK, yet the authorities don't enforce this law which is a violation of their sworn oath.

BiNBo - October 10, 2022, 7:10 am

I live in an area where just about everyone either has a gun openly on their hip or concealed around the waist (myself included). So there's definitely the increased capacity for random violence, as well as the argument that this deters random violence. Nonetheless, I don't necessarily worry about it sitting in my office, but if I'm in certain areas my level of alert goes up. Really depends on where I'm at and what I'm doing. I will say that random attacks are definitely lower in my area than most, mainly because even the thugs know that there's a better chance than not that they'll get shot if they just try to run up on someone. It's also just as easy to for them to get guns illegally as it is for me to legally, so it goes both ways I guess.

Yes, but many they only used marijuana. People always try divert attention away from that drug and blame the others. This should arouse suspicion. Even if it were the case that it's marijuana + alcohol. This is still good enough reason not to introduce marijuana into alcohol obsessed Britain. But it's not, it can make you mentally ill alone.

You can take note of just about any correlation, but correlation does not necessarily equate to causation. Creating false dichotomies is dangerous to individuals and society as a whole my friend. There are more options than, "he smoked marijuana so he must be a violent criminal." and "smoking marijuana will make you a violent criminal."

Correlations can be causations. The evidence is overwhelming that marijuana is associated with psychosis and psychosis violence.

PUBG is kinda addictive game bro. If you have played it for a week or two you will definitely get addicted. Apart it drains a lot of money from its gamers as it keep on bringing expensive buy-in's in game.

I think i've got like 200-300 hours in PUBG. It's a good game for sure, but I can't imagine people thinking that what they are playing is how they should act in real life. Lots of easily influenced kids out in the world though.

You have played around 300 hours and still not addicted to it? You have got good self motivation. And I agree that playing game and taking it to real life is not a plan which people should follow.

Violence increased a lot in France, a recent story (yesterday) : a man fought against 7 men to protect a guy in the street, those men ran away, then they came back at more than 10 to attack him and his girlfriend, he hit one of the guys on the head, and now he's going in jail for 1 year.

You can control ameliorating conditions which contribute to people becoming unhinged and violent. Such as, not taking drugs known to cause psychosis yourself. Or lobbying and voting against legislation which facilitates increased lawlessness.

Taking drugs doesnt 100% cause psychosis in every one that tries them, your signiture is very misleading as the people involved also had lots of drink in them which when mixed with weed is never good!

I never claimed it does, but a high proportion of violent psychopaths are marijuana users. The correlation is alarmingly strong. Combining them is obviously not good, no, but marijuana alone is still a potent psychotropic proven to cause psychosis, see here:

Just because a lot of psychopaths use marijuana don't mean marijuana made them psychos, in my opinion the psychopaths would've had pre-existing risk factors involving mental health, even if they didn't show signs of it but what would you call the healthy? healthy people can still have the psychotic trait without knowing, certain mental disorders tend to run in families, or it could skip a couple of generations in the blood line

Charlie Sheen - October 10, 2022, 2:31 pm

I do in crowded areas like malls and events. I was at this mall a few weeks ago and I heard "pop pop pop!" we were leaving anyways but I made my family and I leave the nearest exit. It was just balloons or something that popped but it sounded like gun shots. Here's where it get's crazy, not even a week later there was a shooting at that mall that turned into a police shootout where they killed the shooter.

I also worry about this when I'm driving on a road trip and have to stop for gas in some seemingly abandoned area. Last night driving back from my dad's which is roughly 5 hours away from me. I stopped at this gas station that for some reason was filled with people outside, a lot of them just sitting in their cars. It was probably 3 or 4am. I fueled up, grabbed some snacks and drove off, and worried the entire time about some Wrong Turn bullshit.

People without any of the traits which qualify them as ill or predisposed. I'm quite certain the studies account for this. It's just a typical coping mechanism to pretend only the pre-existing ill are vulnerable.

"The risk-increasing effects are not explained by shared genetic predisposition between schizophrenia and cannabis use." - <https://pubmed.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/28634109>

Even if it were the case that only the pre-disposed are susceptible, this would still be good enough reason to criminalise and not use. For nobody should want to take the risk still. Eventually, people will learn like they did with alcohol and cigarettes that it was a mistake to legalise marijuana.

(Oct 10, 2022 02:26 PM)mickeh Wrote: [\[CITE\]](#) to be honest i've probably seen more people raging because they havnt got any weed

I bet they have tried weed before raging about the absence of it. More evidence marijuana correlates with violent temper.

This is called poisoning the well fallacy.
