How can I apologize to someone who told me not to call them again?

What do you think?

Have some self respect and don't apologize if they are not that important.

Send them a message of apology. If they don't respond, don't retry.

You aren't doing it for them, you're trying to make yourself feel better, otherwise you'd respect their wishes and leave them alone.

Send them an email saying sorry, and there's no need to respond, I won't bother you again.

But the person above is right, just respect their wishes and leave them alone.

Well, is this person an important person, or just some friend?

This person was important to me, but I didn't realize it at the time

Well, I don't know the circumstances, but perhaps you could say your father recently passed away from cancer and you became angry because of that? Usually when you bring up a death in the immediate family, people are forgiving of that.

If they are asking for you to not to reach out, there is a reason for that. I would say to reach out right away would possibly be the wrong approach and instead I would wait at least 24 hours, reevaluate the circumstance and then at that point if you still feel like you need to apologize then do so.

I'd say time heals everything. Give the person some space, and hopefully an opportunity presents itself.
