Thread: Bitcoin Core Developer hacked for 200 BTC then begs the FBI for help

shreder - January 2, 2023, 1:19 pm

This is literally pure comedy, a Bitcoin Core developer stores his BTC on a server in a hot wallet that got hacked for 200 BTC because his server was compromised. Then he proceeds to beg law enforcement agencies to crack down on the transaction. You literally can't make this shit up even if you tried.

shreder - January 2, 2023, 1:49 pm

If you are a Bitcoin core developer who cannot secure your own funds because you keep your funds on a hot wallet on a compromised server due to malware, you are a moron who deserves to lose it.

Quote:Just to be clear. Mid November Luke posts about malware found on his server and he has no idea what happened.

Today Luke posts about his Bitcoin wallet being emptied that was on his server. And he has no idea on how that happened.

I think i know what the problem is here.

His keys weren't on his server, that's a weird leap the community had decided to make on their own based on his server being compromised days/weeks ago. Luke himself has clarified that the server had no keys stored on it.

Both his hot wallet and cold wallet got hit. The biggest mistake that I can see that he has made was his main desktop was both where he did his every day work from, and where he dealt with his crypto wallets. He very likely got exposed to some sort of malware that compromised his personal machine, and that led to a key compromise. For example, the PyTorch nightly build was compromised for 5 days recently, if he downloaded PyTorch during this time he could have gotten owned (he has confirmed that he hasn't).

Mistakes were made, he could have done better, and with the amount of money available to him, he definitely should have done better. Def could have been more prepared with additional hardware segregated from his main workstation. Think he mentioned having access to old 10+ year old hardware that he was struggling to get going.

Keeping it on a hot wallet is bizarre, especially for someone with his amount of knowledge and experience. The FBI tag was the cherry on top.

It looks like ~199.17 BTC from cold storage, and 3 transactions from what I assume to be hot wallets for 2.5 BTC, 5.5 BTC, 9.65 BTC.

This is my best guess when he says both hot and cold wallets are compromised.

His earlier tweets made it sound like the 200 BTC was from a hot wallet, but I think he was making two separate statements. One, that his hot wallet is compromised, then two, 200 BTC is also stolen.

What's hilarious about somebody getting hacked and robbed? This has nothing to do with the bitcoin network being compromised, to your chagrin. It's likely a personal security oversight, which can happen to anyone. It's not at all unreasonable to appeal to law enforcement when you're the victim of a crime. Your overt Schadenfreude is going to set you up for a major fall soon, you need help.

Unfortunately, you are the sole owner and custodian of your own keys. So whenever I see people beg and cry for the government to intervene on their own mistakes it's hilarious, especially from a bitcoin core developer. You hate me because I am right.

If your server gets hacked and you have value on it, and even if you dont, there's no shame in alerting the authorities. Things like 0days and supply chain exploits can happen, through no fault of your own.

You expose your keys to malware, it's your fault.

I'd imagine it's the majority of his holdings, however, we've seen him make rather desperate sounding pleas to the community while being in a very capable financial position before. Definitely likes to play the 'oh poor me' card when soliciting (not saying that's currently the case here).

Majority of his holdings or not, I'm sure most of us would be making fairly desperate sounding pleas in his situation.

Dumb. It's not a bailout because he's not requesting taxpayers to pay for his stolen property. He's requesting for his property back, and law enforcement has the authority to investigate and make arrests for cybercrime.

The Bitcoin Network still remains decentralized even if funds were stolen. Unlike Proof-of-Stake networks, the stolen coins could be used as an attack vector due to increased ownership of the network.

There are hard forks and soft forks.

You're not using the classic ETH. Ethereum hard forked and deleted their entire chain and created an entirely new one.
