Thread: Does school violence exist in Islamic countries?

James Burnham - June 18, 2023, 1:49 am

ChatGPT says it does, but I don't trust it much. So, people that live in Islamic countries, does school violence exist there? Did you ever have a school shooting? What about gangs? Do they exist? Is it typical for young guys to swear?

School shootings are a very American thing. At least from my understanding it's incredibly rare to occur outside of the USA.

To all misfortunes and bad things, whatever they are and that you can think of exist this rest assured, anything heinous that your mind can even imagine has already been done and not just once. Gangs exist and have existed and yes they are even in schools sometimes. I want to clarify that I am not a person who comes from those places but in any case what you could understand as "school violence" is also due to rudimentary teaching methods and punishments regarding respect for the rules. Just think that in my native country only 50 years ago, in order to impose a punishment, teachers could beat your hands with chopsticks that every teacher had next to his desk, now this phenomenon would lead to the teacher being sentenced to many years in prison.

No, most of these shootings seem to happen in places where the government is trying to take guns away from citizens.

Firstly, there is no such thing as an Islamic country. There are countries with Muslim majorities but no Islamic country exists now/yet.

Secondly, I've been around Muslim majority areas as well as areas where Muslims are a minority and attended educational institutions in said areas and I think the picture is mostly same everywhere. Didn't have any school shootings though but other than that everything's pretty much the same.

How do you define an Islamic country?

School violence absolutely exists as a result of Islam extremists targeting schools. Bombings are the preferred method of inflicting harm though rather than shootings.

Quote:“They say, ‘You should send a male representative,’” the director, Aqila, said inside the Sayed Ul-Shuhada High School, which was shattered in May by a terrorist bombing that killed scores of girls.

A country where the government enforces the rules of the religion 100%.

Saudi Arabia?

Quote:Saudi Arabia is a Muslim country in which Islamic law is strictly enforced.

The worlds only country named after the family that rules it? Islam does not permit charging fees from pilgrims. The religion also does not permit preventing Muslims from settling in the country. These two points alone should tell you whether the government running the country is Islamic or not.

Don't get me wrong here. I've been to Saudi Arabia and have nothing against the country.

Wouldn't we hear it on the news if it happened?
Even if it did, would we care enough to listen before changing channels to something more entertaining?

Great points. Saudi Arabia is the being run by a family of bandits who were installed by the British. They're not even Muslims if you dig a bit deeper.

So in the above instance, the below does not apply?

I dont think it does. My personal opinion is not to sugarcoat stuff and call a spade a spade. Others might disagree and I am okay with it.

It's crucial to remember that Islamic countries are not monolithic. They are diverse in terms of culture, governance, socioeconomic conditions, and educational systems. While some might face challenges related to school violence, others might have safe and nurturing educational environments. It's essential to approach this topic with nuance and avoid overgeneralizing based on the situations in a few countries.
