Thread: Is there a good keylogger I can use on a computer I have complete control over?

laguerre2 - August 18, 2023, 8:03 pm

I'm looking for a good, established keylogger that I can install on a Windows 10 computer that I own but that is used by others, that's easy to hide. It can also be Chrome only, as just logging the browser would work fine. There's one out there that's the first Google search result, but it doesn't seem to be updated.

Software Keyloggers: Meterpreter, DivineLogger, PowerSploit (all of these should be flagged by antivirus)

Hardware Keyloggers: O.MG cable, KeyCroc, AirDrive Keylogger, KeyGrabber

Did you know that there is a Keylogger forum?

Since you have complete control over the machine, you could install Python and write a keylogger with it.

If you don't know how to code one, there are lots of tutorials online. This is the best one I could find (you can also just copy-paste it): [hxxps\[:\]thepythoncode\[.\]com/article/write-a-keylogger-python](https://thepythoncode.com/article/write-a-keylogger-python)

With it you can either save keystrokes to a file or send them via email (not to Gmail tho) and if you use the .pyw extension (instead of the usual .py), it will automatically hide the console window.

N.B.: to avoid opening the console, you have to remove all the prints from the code

I have the O.MG cables but have been looking at the KeyCroc. Looks interesting, might just have to get it and experiment.
