Thread: android keylogger

NullPounce - November 16, 2023, 6:18 pm

I just updated PounceKey's on Github to include builders for reporting logs to Gmail, Discord, and IP, downside is its up to android 9 pie api 28 and requires user to enable the accessibility service but if you have access to the phone it just says BatteryHealth Update service and even gives a warning that disabling may degrade performance/ life of the battery, up to android 9 its full launcher stealth. theres lokiboard thats even on the play store but thats local logs, been trying to make a gmail version.

An Android keylogger is a type of monitoring software that records keystrokes on an Android device. It can capture all text entered on the keyboard, including passwords, messages, and search queries. While keyloggers can be used for legitimate purposes like parental control or employee monitoring, they can also pose privacy and security risks if used maliciously. It's crucial to use keyloggers responsibly and ethically, ensuring they comply with privacy laws and are only used with the consent of the device owner for legitimate and lawful purposes.

You realize that this will only work on about 1 in 8 Android devices and steadily declining, right?

Github says, it works until 13 version. If so, it's a good share. Nonetheless. What are the exe files in the source code. Are those compiled binaries of the python files with same name?

njygvf - June 27, 2024, 5:26 pm

Well it doesnt work for all android phones

I thought we were discussing Android. Not that Android devices ordinarily have keyboards connected to them.
