It's the auth cookie or stay-logged-in cookie. There's no naming convention that websites have to follow. So first thing: the cookie may be invalid. Second: there is likely something else that is causing a suspicious login detection. You have to emulate the original device, and the requests it makes as closely as possible.

Your biggest mistake is "I want to start hacking people right now." What you needed to do is start by practicing on intentionally vulnerable boxes and testing environments to get the techniques down and be properly prepared.
