What was the most outrageous lie you believed as a child? I did believe I might find another world in a wardrobe.

??? hmm I wonder if Narnia had anything to do with that..

My parents come from 3rd world and at the time were quite religious. Mum would say chant these prayers for this and that.

Bogus as fuck

The fact that parents around the world have managed to keep up this lie for so long is impressive, shocking, and borderline unsettling LMAO.

Whenever we were driving and I was misbehaving, my parents pointed to a house and said "that's where the bad children go". I believed it every time and they literally pointed to a different house every time, LOL.

I think I used to fall asleep while walking down the stairs in our old house. I thought that I might have floated down the stairs. I still kinda think I did float to the bottom... I've also fallen down these stairs a handful of times when I was a kid ??

Nooo..

What I found was putting in the hard work and building something rather than relying on prayers is where I started to see success.

Reflecting back, I can see religion was used as a coping mechanism because the financial struggles my parents constantly faced as a middle class family in an expensive city and with lack of education, really relied on their prayers.

I don't pray or believe in religion anymore but I believe in working hard and making somethin for yourself.

Most outrageous lie I believed as a child was probably the one about mummy taking a nap with a bottle of vodka at 11am being quite normal. When I was about 5 I tried some of her 'medicine' to see what it tasted like. Not good, was the answer.

That's very cute. When I found out about Santa I didn't feel betrayed at all. I felt admiration that my parents did all that for me without taking any credit for it.

The stories of different holiday figures are probably the biggest lies

Big ol' bearded lad flies on a sleigh of reindeers to every house in the world, in one night, and goes down the chimney with a sack of toys, while consuming what you could estimate as billions of cookies and treats.

Yeah, like at that moment I felt betrayed. But soon after the same thing, and now days I even join my dad every Christmas as a helper. He does these things for other families now days. So he is kinda the local Santa of my home town, which is great. To see the younglings have the best Christmas they could hope for.

The whole idea that if an animal followed you home your could keep it. I bet my mother wouldn't have let me keep it. But actually that did happen for me finally when I was 24 a ginger cat followed me home and he was so muscly that he didn't look starving at first, but when you had a closer look he was actually emaciated under muscle and he was the best most loyal cat I ever had. He was much more like a dog in his devotion to me and followed me everywhere.

Some would even say college didn't prepare you for the real world. I would kind of agree with you guys to an extent. I feel the real world the people that inherited companies don't know what they're doing and are makin stupid decisions like why should I hire someone straight out of college when I can only hire experienced workers.

Entry jobs now and days are gone. Companies just now want you to put the same effort as starting your own business and figuring things out yourself but not getting paid like one.
