Thread: What's a cause or charity you're passionate about supporting?

Prawnster - October 5, 2024, 4:33 pm

Thats if you have any, if you don't like supporting charity, maybe expand on why you don't like it?

I feel some charity is kinda bullshit and the fact that they spend like 80% of the money they make on payments and marketing is kinda frustrating but I guess it does kinda work because they are obviously helping people.

What do you think?

Yeah that's facts, I did some fund raising in college for breast cancer and in my last place I was doing sales we had the option to give like x amount of our commission to the UK breast cancer research people so I was doing that too :D

Yeah I think the Breast Cancer research is important and there are some good charities fighting to research it and hopefully one day cure it.

Cancer has taken a few people I've known and cared about in my life so I'll take whatever chance I can to say a big ole Fuck You to cancer.

Sounds like a good cause bud, keep it up! :)

Animal shelters and wildlife conservation charities are close to my heart.

I love supporting causes that help protect animals.

Vip?r - October 13, 2024, 12:34 pm

Problem with charity is a lot of them are pretty much scams, even the big names like Red Cross (iirc misappropriation of funds).

The whole 2012 Kony is a good reminder.

Epic - October 13, 2024, 12:39 pm

I've directly donated to a charity, but I have done volunteer work a few times. If I was going to donate, assuming I knew the charity was legit, I would probably pick something relating to cancer, local water and river cleanups, food for the homeless, or nature conservation.

TheGoldenRelik - October 13, 2024, 1:09 pm

Used to go volunteering. Have been in a lot and I came down to the conclusion that everything is in someone's profit.

We are f animals, ready to have a feast on each others heart at the right moment

What do you think?

A hospital called 57357 for kids cancer, and many kids specialized hospital, thats what i care most for

Eran - October 15, 2024, 7:59 am

Animal shelters definitely.

I'd rather donate to people I know are in need, you know, if you meet someone talk for a few months and they open up about some problems that could use a helping hand or some cash I'm always happy to help as long as it's genuine and the person works on repaying me, obviously I wont take it, if the person works his ass off, if it's a cunt who used me for money I expect full payment back.

Nowadays it's very hard to distinguish between people that genuinely need help and people that are just using you is the only issue I see with that one.

This.

Charities as a whole for the most part are a "Non profit" racket. They are in fact, profit and/or used by big business as a method of tax reduction. If you want to help, just find people you can help. Charities are a complete fucking scam for the most part. I'm not saying they're all sketchy, but for the most part they are.

Exactly, that's why if I feel used, it wasn't a donation, it was a loan. If I give someone money and he proceeds to spend it on stupid shit, instead of using the money to actually fix problems, I'll expect reimbursement and I'll be pushy, and demand that money.

Couldnt care less for say 100-1000 bucks, it wont impact my budget at all, but it's just the principle, and a lesson for the person, not to be a dick and learn about their own finances, I ain't no bank nor a charity lol

Jinu - October 15, 2024, 7:16 pm

I definitely get what you're saying. Some charities can feel more like businesses with the way they allocate funds, which can be frustrating. But I try to support causes that have more transparency about where the money goes. I'm passionate about environmental conservation efforts and local initiatives that directly help the community. Those tend to have a clearer impact, and you can often see the difference they're making. What kinds of causes are you more skeptical about?

Yeah I get that, it's always more about the principle than the funds for sure.
