I had an answer to this kind of question in another thread: "When did you start coding?"

In essence, just find a way to incrementally learn new things in a way that you find fun. Feel free to bounce around projects in order to learn new concepts, then try going back and re-evaluating how you did older projects and see what you would do differently with more experience under your belt. Rinse and repeat. Game modding is a great place to start.

I started with a free C++ course on Udemy (warez disallowed). The instructor did a pretty good job, it was easy to follow along and has made it pretty easy to pick up other languages.

No problem guy, I hope you enjoy it and that it helps you out. If you stick with it, it should, there's hours of material there. Some of was a little boring, but I had fun playing around with the assignments.
