Do you find yourself cursing more often than you should be or are you more of a reserved person who doesn't cuss much?

RangoWorld - January 7, 2025, 7:19 am

No. I rarely cuse. When I do it's usually to myself just saying "fuck".

figghiozzu - January 7, 2025, 12:10 pm

No, I often find myself swearing a lot; unfortunately, I don't have much patience.

I avoid cussing as much as I can. If I do cuss it would be that I am pissed off at something you did in a retarded way.

so, when driving and seeing people in the wrong side of the road driving and honking at me thinking I am in the work would piss me off and I might curse if the person follows me and starts yapping at me. In the past I would let it go...but by doing this the issues grew people now really think if you don't do something about it or say something about it they're in the right which encourages them to do more wrong things. That is why today where I live most people don't know how to drive and it's at the point that you just yolo it on the road.

I do swear a lot I can't lie. I keep it away from the kiddos though. Bad enough my son said "fuck you" to me once.

Cursing is for bad boys.

My mouth is smooth as vanilla cream.

Depends on the person I am dealing with.

Actually, controlling your anger, pausing and increasing your authority without swearing(cursing) is more alarming than someone who swears.

Shouting go fuck yourself isn't as effective as looking at someone, walking over and whispering in their ear "good luck" while smiling or "Not today kid, the boys are busy and I don't have time to bury you"

Or fold up a 20 and place it in their hand suggesting to give it to their wife/mother as you were short last time.

I mean swearing has its place, but I think I prefer the other person swearing these days. Like a little dog barking

I used to swear a lot more than I do now. A colleague brought up my excessive cursing a handful of years ago, which brought to light just how much I did and that I should consider taking it down a notch or two. Since then I've drastically cut down and reserved cursing for when it's necessary.
