I never said that aliens came to Earth.

I can only testify to what we witnessed:

- spherical objects, metallic in nature, hovering and flying with no visible resistance from wind, etc.
- orbs of light traveling at speeds that there is no technology for

I could go on and on, but the point is this:

- I do not give a fuck who they are, what they are, at end of the day.
- The only thing that matters is that there is technology that would completely alter our understanding of physics, flight, and energy use.

This ultimately is why regardless of who/what/where/why/when, we must do research.

If it's the gov? Great. Lets find out how 1 government deployed them all around the entire world, without acknowledging who owns them.

- we did it in china
- russia
- australia
- england
- canada
- america
- japan
- the list literally goes on for dozens of countries.

Not sure how else to say it:

> if it's a gov, none of our enemies shot them down? Hmm, so that must mean we have a secret org between countries working together, even as we fight eachother politically publicly?

> if its not a gov, then okay which private company is holding on to tech that could make them instant trillionaires?

> If it's not gov or an org, then who?

You don't just develop superior space flight capable of destroying all of your adversaries, and then not say anything about it.

Just saying.

I don't think it's aliens at all, but anyone who is 'celebrating' it being a government is missing the entire point of my posts.

It does not matter who. It only matters that the tech exists, and we're sitting here driving old fossil fuel cars instead of defying gravity in the skies with whatever is up there.

Hope this makes sense.

Look up & wake up people. I stopped posting but the fleets come every night in my area and 100s of other areas around the entire planet. This is neither a east coast thing, or a US thing. It's an Earth issue.

But what if they did come and some are in jail already?

I'm fine with that. I think it's more likely that one of these is true, than aliens recently coming:

> secret blacksite science lab, ran by a gov > breakaway group -> NASA only hired like 2000 Nazi scientists after WW2. Perhaps there were more who went on to study what they were working on in private.

> breakaway civ -> hidden or protected civilization that defies our understanding of history.

Example: someone developing superior tech in the earlier 1900s, or prior.

> return civ -> left Earth a while ago, but returned - I still would argue that the return is more likely to be 50-100 years ago from US docs, or hundreds of years older if you go off of collected stories.
All in all, I do not think aliens found Earth or came to Earth recently.

What do you think of Roswell? Do you think a craft crash landed there?

Eh, I think there's a lot of "evidence" and a lot of "stories".

I find more credibility in some of the weirder coincidences in other stories that are far less well known.

For example I found a letter a lady wrote in the 1500s in my area that described the orbs almost perfectly.

Or another even older that describes the drone fleet eerily well.

That to me holds more weight than some of the more widespread events because by the time Roswell came about, we were already testing private craft (as government, but also with private companies), there were so many witnesses without more evidence, etc.

That said - Roswell is interesting and even if there was no aliens it's highly likely that there was a crash of some sort.

We've been retrieving craft with Lockheed Martin & a couple others for like 50+ years at this point, maybe 70? Time flies.

Do you think if the government had alien technology, do you think they would use it for the upper hand in war, or do you think they would use it for peaceful technology to help humans?

I don't think it's alien technology guaranteed, but I'll say unknown-origin technology, or known-origin recovered technology.

I do think we would use it for the upper hand, 100%.

For example, with what we saw it wouldn't be hard to believe that the orbs could travel to any location on Earth and disarm or impact any ballistic missile. I have no technological or scientific explanation for what we saw. There is theoretical science and that's it - maybe someone cracked it, but publicly there's no knowledge of this type of travel.

The first experience that involved truly superior speeds and physical capabilities went across the entire horizon / sky in a second, paused, hovered, and flew back and then zipped off. We're talking hundreds, or possibly thousands of G-Force. It could quite literally take down anything it wanted, catching up to a missile with no issue.

So yes, upper hand - but could be used for international safety.

Imagine for a moment that a country say "sorry guys, EVERY nuke shot by ANY country will be shot down safely before it reaches its destination". That could be quite an interesting future for us all, if that authority/gov/owner is peaceful 100% of the time.

According to whistleblowers, multiple countries are working on the tech.

Maybe it's alien, maybe it's recovered/discovered, maybe it's just a new breakthrough! Either way, I do think the military power dynamic will shift with this stuff. Whoever it is, they win basically.

Also, look! I found 1 good thing about Musk I can celebrate lol:

I can understand all of that except the woke part. Wokeness and DEI have proven to be detrimental to society. When you choose race over qualifications, we go downhill. It used to be the best man for the job. Now its all about race and diversity and not the best person for the job or the most qualified.

I don't know what people think "woke" means but to me it means:

- policies that are nuanced and take into account multiple different perspectives, populations, demographics, etc.
- I will never hire a race / gender / orientation / etc over skills. Skills only hiring for me, as-is ethical and right.

I consider "woke" to be a mindset, a good mindset - one that just means you are not making a decision based on only 1 aspect without considering others.

I consider "DEI" to be a policy, one that is based with good intentions, but unfortunately has the side effect of prioritizing social issues over skills. DEI would be like hiring someone just because they are black - or ignoring a better candidate because they are not a minority group. I don't agree with that at all, but I also don't agree with dismantling every single effort to increase diversity. Diversity is great - but we should fund the education of all from the start rather than giving jobs later. Hope that makes sense. I would like to see an effort to make sure every group has opportunities, but if they are unable to take advantage of those opportunities then people shouldn't be required to hire them.

In comparison, woke would be acknowledging that a poor person who couldn't afford education likely worked harder to obtain the same credentials as someone who had it paid for by their wealthy father.

- Woke is about hiring the person based on skills, but acknowledging that not all skills are shown on paper.
- DEI is about ignoring what's on paper, but also what's not on paper, and going with a hire based on something unrelated.

Lets get back to the aliens topic lol, it's more fun.

Well, this touches on the topic of evolution. If reptilian mother fuckers are walking around, then for sure they've evolved faster than us. But on another topic, I don't believe we are the only living beings in the galaxy. There has to be something more than just us.
