Interesting wording. Why would you tell a complete stranger much of anything to begin with?

Furthermore, why would said stranger have any incentive to interfere?

Did you experience something that led you to jot down these points?

I don't think so... I think a stranger is a person that you never met in person in your life.

So, people you talk online will always be strangers. People you talk in person over time turn from being a strange to being an acquaintance. Then over time could change into a friend.

However, as humans you need friends and a tribe for many things. You have to learn to work together.

I think in the U.S.A we are going in the wrong direction. We are fighting with each other and sabotaging each other.
and hurting one another. Yet, other countries don't do this.

It's because in the U.S.A we are slowly going backwards. We are not progressing. We mostly steal from other nations the technology and concepts and then claim it as our own. The other countries help each other to not just learn but to work in teams. If someone is weak you will have to help them to get to your level. Once there normally they respect you and help you grow also.

In the U.S.A it's not like that because people have egos an always want to be the smartest and the best and be praised for it. So, they try and not help you at all and love to misguide you. It gives them an advantage over you. Even use the LAW to bully you into defeat.

Look at the copyright laws. It was originally there because they didn't want you to just copy and paste other peoples work and sell it for a profit and sell it at a cheaper price then the people that put time and effort and money into the work.

Now, they extended it or the authors life plus 50 more years after their death. Which means we went form above to... never allowing anyone to do anything similar for their lifetime.

Which makes the society less productive and innovative. They also do it in the sense that they don't want you to even try anything of your own even if it's legal they want you to come to them to do such works and charge you an arm and a leg.

Same goes with people. I feel people that know you on a personal level have more incentive to hurt you. This includes co-workers.. when I mean on a personal level meaning these are the people that might not be your fried but you have to see them and work with them for many years.
co-workers are like your family. You will see them all the time and you won't always get along.

I would say strangers are just people walking out in the public never met you and you start talking to them.

They have no incentive to hurt you or laugh at you. They will give you their honest opinion about you ... why?

because most of them will think well this will be the only conversation that we will have.

whereas, if you talk to your co-workers or someone you know and see often. You won't say honest things in the sense to not hurt their feelings.

Like you have some sort of censorship when talking to people you know and it's because you don't want to hurt them and also you don't want them to hurt you in any way.

However, overall you have to trust someone. Your parents will die one day and you might not always have family around. You need close friends that you can trust with anything in life. The problem with that is that for men in this society it's hard. It's hard because we cannot trust anyone to get close to us in our own business or private matters. It's because if you share it the other men would think you're a dumbass for sharing it and would do something negative to you to have fun with the mistake you just made. Which means they're not open to you.
