Thread: The Call That Shouldnt Have Happened

truePi - March 13, 2025, 1:33 pm

It started with a phone call late at night. The clock read 11:47 PM when the phone rang, cutting through the silence. On the other end, a voice whispered, weak and urgent.

"Please, be careful."

There was no caller ID, no record of the call. Just those three words before the line went dead.

The voice sounded familiar. Too familiar. Like someone who had been gone for years. The kind of voice that shouldn't have been calling at all.

Two days later, he went to see his father at the care facility. It was supposed to be a routine visit, nothing out of the ordinary. But something felt off the moment he stepped inside. His father was agitated, muttering under his breath, pacing the room. The air was heavy, thick with something unspoken.

Then, suddenly, a flash of metal. His father had a knife.

The struggle was fast, chaotic. He grabbed at his father's wrist, trying to push the blade away. The door burst open. Officers rushed in, shouting commands, weapons drawn.

"Drop the knife!"

For a split second, everything slowed. He could barely breathe. If he made the wrong move, it would be over. He let go. The knife clattered to the floor. Hands yanked him back. The officers hesitated, realizing he wasn't the threat.

Hours later, sitting alone in his car, he finally exhaled. His hands were shaking. Then he remembered the call.

There had never been a record of it. No missed call. No voicemail. No way to prove it ever happened.

But it did. And it saved his life.
