I wanted to buy hacked cPanels, and he couldn't provide any proof, asks for money upfront, and absolutely refuses to share the domain list. What does this mean? It means he has nothing in his hands because if he were a real seller, he would share everything. Be very careful, he's after a big scam.

Let's get the facts straight.

How can I be called a scammer when there was no deal, no payment, and no exchange whatsoever? This individual never paid me — not even $1 — so where exactly is the scam? Did I take his money and disappear? No. Did we complete any transaction? No. So accusing me of being a scammer without a single penny being exchanged is completely baseless and absurd.

I run a reliable and trusted service, and I've worked with many serious clients who understand how business is done. I don't entertain time-wasters who demand full access or proof without any commitment, and then cry "scam" when they don't get everything for free.

Let's be clear — real buyers act professionally, they don't throw random accusations just because they couldn't get something on their terms. If you haven't paid, you have no right to accuse. Period.
