Polymarket, a decentralized prediction market platform, is integrating Chainlink’s oracle network to improve the accuracy and speed of its market resolutions, the companies announced Friday.

Polymarket has partnered with Chainlink to integrate its data standard into Polymarket’s resolution process, according to a Friday press release shared with Cointelegraph.

The collaboration will initially focus on enhancing the accuracy and speed of asset pricing resolutions, with plans to expand into additional markets.

While Polymarket’s pricing prediction integration with Chainlink is live on the Polygon mainnet immediately, the parties expect to explore additional prediction markets using Chainlink in the future.

Polymarket uses Polygon by default

Chainlink’s integration marks a significant development for Polymarket as the platform uses the Polygon blockchain — a layer-2 (L2) Ethereum scaling solution — as its underlying network.

Launched in 2020, Polymarket has emerged as a major crypto-enabled prediction market platform, where users can place bets on the outcomes of future events using digital assets like Circle's USDC

While Polygon is focused on delivering faster and cheaper transactions by processing transactions off the main Ethereum chain, Chainlink provides an oracle network that connects smart contracts on the blockchain with real-world external data.

As such, while Polygon is Polymarket's chain by default, Chainlink will be sending data to settle the markets into the Polygon chain in production.

"Polymarket's decision to integrate Chainlink's proven oracle infrastructure is a pivotal milestone that greatly enhances how prediction markets are created and settled," Chainlink co-founder Sergey Nazarov said, adding:

"When market outcomes are resolved by high-quality data and tamper-proof computation from oracle networks, prediction markets evolve into reliable, real-time signals the world can trust."

"Subjective" markets explored

In addition to pricing market integration, which has a clear, definitive resolution, Polymarket and Chainlink will explore methodologies to bring in additional prediction markets, the announcement said.

Beyond pricing predictions, Polymarket and Chainlink are also exploring how to apply oracle networks to more subjective questions, which have typically relied on social voting mechanisms. The companies say expanding to these markets could further minimize bias and strengthen resolution integrity.

The firms did not immediately respond to Cointelegraph's request for further details.

The news came soon after the US Commodity Futures Trading Commission issued a no-action letter to a clearinghouse acquired by Polymarket in early September, marking another case of US regulators softening their approach to crypto enforcement in 2025.

In late August, Polymarket added Donald Trump Jr. to its advisory board after securing investment from 1789 Capital, which tied the prediction market more closely to US politics. [warn] [warn]

I don't see why it needs it when it works like all the other betting sites, where other players are determining the market and the site is just taking a percentage.

Funny how a chance at $500 turns you into such a lq shitposter. Must be down bad if $500 does this to you (or maybe you're always low quality, no idea what any of your content looks like before you decided to start spamming this section).

Dont want or need the 500, just some advice, put a disclaimer on the foot of your posts or threads in that section eg this is NOT financial advice.

You are literally quoting , repping and replying everywhere. But ofc adding more chars to your "hq" "spam-hate" replies make them suitable . Lmao.

You could just click the report button which is made for this or this could be your chance to shine and look like a "Guardian" like the ones you mentioned Hf needs ?

While this is a HQ reply embracing the look of HF.

Cry harder ? I just quoted once what you did multiple times.

Maybe you should elevate your posts quality a bit too mate.

Good move—combining Polymarket with Chainlink can make predictions more accurate and trustworthy using decentralized data. Smart partnership??

Spammer spams the forum, gets -repped for it, then gets all upset and tries to take the high and mighty stance lmao cry harder, spammer

Before you said this, I had 2 posts in the crypto section complaining about this. Are you retarded or can you just not count very well?

On the other hand...

Not one of these replies was even remotely high quality. Just a bunch of smooth-brained spam.

In what world do you deserve a thought out or respectful reply? You spam this section with some of the smoothest brain content imaginable, act like a douchebag when given a -rep for it, then sit here and demanding some sort of thought out or respectful reply? Go fuck yourself, retard. I didn't even say a word to you, yet here you are crashing out like some whiny bitch boy.

Glad to hear this.. I was just mentioning in this other thread that I'd like to see Polymarket have better resolution methods for bets. Sounds like they're on the right track with this. I'd like to see more partnerships to help decentralize or otherwise validate market resolutions. That's definitely going to be important w/ the new valuation & continued marketing hype.

I am fine for this stuff to be used for resolutions methods, but I really dislike the idea of it being used to determine pricing.

That's the problem though, they can't really offer any crypto/financial markets to bet on without also determining final pricing.

Who sets the price of bitcoin?

There is no "single price" of BTC.

Should they use Coinmarketcap?

Etoro?

Coinbase?

Binance?

Kraken?

The only way to resolve bets based on crypto markets is to determine the price.

I saw a bet for tomorrow, for whether Bitcoin will be above $110K, or above $112K.

Who decides what the value is, and how do they decide that?

---> As long as Poly is transparent & bettors know how it's priced, they can bake that into a strategy.

---> I'd be more worried if there were no others being brought in to help with this, and even more concerned if Polymarket uses a single source of truth for pricing.

The more people involved in the pricing, the better - assuming it's transparent, honest, valid, etc.

I don't think we should trust Polymarket to resolve their own bets / prices at close.

Solid move. Chainlink integration should make Polymarket data more reliable.

Agreed, and as people can trust it more, there should also be more and more action on the platform.
