Bullish Bitcoin bets unraveled below $110K: Will October revive risk-on sentiment?

Bitcoin is down 5%, its sharpest weekly drop since March, but October seasonality and long-term holder stability suggest a potential recovery ahead.

I just don't see the growth potential in the short-term anymore. I do believe in a $1M bitcoin eventually. I do not think BTC is the most exciting investment right now though.

Here's a prediction I made that we'll see an ATH in late 2025:

Based on what I see now and my original prediction model, we should see a drop to roughly 90K or so soon as a market test, followed by a pump back up to retest $120K and beyond.

This seems realistic. I'll likely set some buys for 90k and 80k just in case.

I treat BTC as a long-term investment. My prediction models are usually for 2-4 year forecasts. So far everything is in line with trend lines established back around 2022.

Take this with a grain of salt. I do not consider a pump to $200K - doubling - to be "exciting". That does not mean it won't go up. For me, 5-10x+ is exciting in short-term.

I am not excited by BTC, but I am bullish still.

I do think the next big pump will be roughly 380-430K ATH, but I'm talking over next few years or longer, not this year.
