Thread: introduce Sajo Story

Wrong thread hope this gets moved to the right spot.

I moved to South Carolina because my parents had no choice but to buy a house there. We live in a safe, basic old town — nothing special.

At 6 years old I started getting into computers. I thought they were the coolest thing. I spent my whole life on computers and never left my room. My parents started getting worried because I never had friends and I was becoming antisocial. I don't talk much at school. I'm only into computers because something about them gives me freedom. But my parents took my computer away and locked it up in a secure case. I was sad. At the dinner table I said, "I want my computer back." I showed them a report card which I hacked from the school system it had a vulnerable system and my parents gave me my computer back because I made them hope I had friends and good grades, which I didn't. I lied. I only had friends on the internet because online you can't see each other's faces, which made me feel safe. On the internet, you name it gaming forums and cool stuff. I was a clicker, clicking to make money for one of those services. I would switch IPs and make about $20 per week. Not much, but it was saving for college because this is what I wanted to be. I found my pace you have to start somewhere and grow stronger. My name is Michael Murphy. I want to become a white-hat hacker. I take down phishing sites using scripts I created to spam junk at the websites and to hack scammers from India who act like Microsoft, etc.

Thank you for having me here.

Hey Michael, welcome and thanks for sharing that. Real talk: your story shows curiosity, drive, and hustle, and those are exactly the traits that make a good security person.
