Despite signs that her daughter had been undergoing diabetic ketoacidosis, the woman took her children on a road trip and the 10-year-old went into a coma and died in the backseat, per a probable cause affidavit.

An investigation found that the woman's daughter had Type 1 diabetes and was believed to have died from "prolonged diabetic ketoacidosis" — a life-threatening medical emergency that can happen after a person doesn't receive enough insulin, per Mayo Clinic.

Police said their investigation concluded that "the lack of medical intervention contributed to the child's death."

Prosecutors claimed the mother should have known that she was in danger due to prior training. Her daughter's condition continued to worsen as they embarked on the road trip, the probable cause documents say.
