Thread: Should I Go All-In on the Next Bitcoin Dip, or Diversify? Looking for Insight

nanipoonani - December 7, 2025, 2:33 am

Over the last major dip, I was very close to investing all my available money into Bitcoin. My instinct was pushing me strongly in that direction. For some reason, I feel more comfortable holding Bitcoin than holding euros or US dollars. FIAT currencies have disappointed me several times, and I've lost confidence in their long-term reliability.

This brings me to my dilemma:

When the next significant dip happens, should I invest everything into Bitcoin, or is that a reckless move?

A bit of background: when I was younger, I bought 7 BTC for around €50 and later sold them all for a €2,000 profit. At the time, I was thrilled—until Bitcoin skyrocketed afterward. Now when I look at my old wallet history, it honestly hurts.

Part of me believes Bitcoin will continue to grow long-term. Another part of me wonders if I should avoid emotional decisions and invest in something more stable—maybe even start a small business like a food truck.

I'm unsure how to move forward and would appreciate some perspectives from the community:

Do you believe Bitcoin will continue to grow long-term?

Is going all-in on a dip too risky, even if you're confident in the asset?

Should I consider splitting my investments between crypto and a real-world business?

Any thoughtful advice would be greatly appreciated.
