I've noticed something interesting.

Most people spend years trying to optimize productivity apps.

Very few optimize their decision-making.

Better questions have helped me more than better software.

What creates revenue?

Quote:In my opinion, Solving a pain or a problem for e.g: We take care of old people by cleaning their house ourselves or we sell a product that help people clean their house. What removes risk?

Quote:In my opinion, A plan, a system or a framework by asking several negative questions for e.g: What if the house was so dirty? It does not matter we still have to clean it. What if the old people aka the client talk to us in a bad way during our work? does not matter, we still have to do our job. What if he does not pay me the remaining when I finish the job? A legal contract must be written before the work begin or an intermediary who know both parties commitment. What creates trust?

Quote:In my opinion, the way we communicate, the way we approach work, and the best thing is having clean intentions, helping at first without asking or expecting anything in return. A trial plan. What can be automated?

Quote:In my opinion, anything that is online can be automated, especially in this AI era. However, behind the automation itself must be a human with good faith and clean intentions. What actually needs me?

Quote:In my opinion: The world needs us, our parents, our friends, our colleges, our country, our hometown, our neighbors, the animals, the plants, everything basically need a human being to do the right things for it to keep living.

The answers usually simplify everything. Would love to hear you answering these questions.
