Do you think the global economy will crash?

Japan right now are selling U.S. bonds it has 260% of GDP that is their national debt. It's going to get worse.

It's going to cause a domino effect that no one can stop. The question is why now?

The job market where I am at in the U.S.A sucks.

What do you guys think about this?

Japan's debt and changes in U.S. bond holdings could create pressure, especially with high interest rates and weak job markets. Still, economies have safeguards that may prevent a complete domino effect. I think we'll likely see more instability and slower growth before an actual global crash.

The thing is that Europe and many countries are in financial ruin. I feel on a global scale everything is financially imbalanced.

The people that is poor or middle class will suffer. Just watch japan and Pakistan. One of them will default on all their debt.

I don't know which one will come first but once one of them falls it will start a slow domino effect.

Seems like every country is heading toward that
