Thread: What's one family tradition you hope never disappears?

For us, it's getting the whole family together during special occasions, especially Christmas and New Year.

I love it when everyone makes time to come over, bring some food, eat together and just catch up on what's been happening in our lives. Even when things get a little noisy with the kids running around and everyone talking at the same time, those are the moments I enjoy the most.

Now that I have a family of my own, I really hope my kids grow up enjoying these gatherings as much as I do. And hopefully, even when they're older and have families of their own, we'll still find time to get together like we always have.

Usually Christmas and new years but I've in recent years just spent them with my wife making our own traditions.

Christmas and New Year are always special, but creating your own traditions with your wife makes them even more meaningful. ? Those are the memories you'll cherish for years to come!

Oh kinda sad knowing you'll be spending Christmas and New Year away from your family and loved ones. Still, I hope you and your wife have an amazing time and make beautiful memories together!

Those yearly trips are something special to look forward to. Nothing beats spending quality time together, exploring new places and making memories that last a lifetime!

Ohh I love our family tradition of taking a weekend every other month to just get blasted.

The jack sparrow type side quests we got on em weekends are fucking fun. Uncles, grandparents, cousins, aunts all of us fucking hammered.

I would like to keep the Elf on the Shelf tradition going forever but I know that the kids will eventually grow out of it.

little fun pranks with one another, and wearing matching Pajamas on Christmas.
